HISTORICAL NOTE

The consent decree (a decree by a court to which all parties agree) negotiated between the state of Louisiana through its Board of Regents and the United States Department of Justice outlined steps the state was required to take to alleviate alleged racial discrimination in its publicly funded institutions of higher education. Prior to 1950, Louisiana's colleges were segregated by law: Southern University and Grambling State University were for Black students, and the other universities were strictly for white students. Between 1950 and 1964, the federal courts ordered the admission of individuals regardless of color to all colleges. The Louisiana legislature attempted to fight this by enacting segregation laws that were ultimately found to be unconstitutional. In Brown v. Board of Education (1954), the United States Supreme Court held that the concept of "separate but equal" was a denial of equal protection under the United States Constitution. The Brown decision was extended to higher education in Florida ex rel Hawkins v. Board of Control (1956). The Civil Rights Act of 1964 mandated that all colleges adopt open admissions and would be denied federal funds if they maintained racially segregated systems of higher education.

As a result of discrimination lawsuits filed by private plaintiffs, the United States Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (HEW) declared without hearings that Louisiana and nine other states (Alabama, Georgia, Florida, Maryland, Mississippi, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, and Virginia) were in violation of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. HEW determined that these states operated dual systems of higher education, demanded desegregation plans, and threatened to cut off federal funds. Louisiana refused to submit a plan because it believed that its open admissions policy constituted compliance. In 1970, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), on behalf of the taxpayers of the states listed above, filed suit against HEW's Office of Civil Rights for failure to cut off federal funding to those states found in violation of Title VI. In 1973, HEW imposed deadlines for submitting acceptable desegregation plans or risk losing federal funding. All states except Louisiana submitted a plan; Mississippi's plan was deemed unacceptable. Louisiana still contended that its open admissions policy meant compliance with the Civil Rights Act. The Louisiana State University Board of Supervisors filed a suit against HEW for declaratory judgment (establishes rights and other legal relations of the parties without providing for or ordering enforcement) prior to termination of funding, but the suit was dismissed. Since Louisiana refused to submit a desegregation plan, HEW referred the case in 1974 to the United States Department of Justice (DoJ). DoJ filed suit in U.S. District Court against Louisiana and its higher education boards (including the newly formed Board of Regents) seeking compliance with the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution and Title VI of the Civil Rights Act.

After some initial discovery (compulsory disclosure of facts or documents relative to a case), the case lay dormant until 1979 when discovery resumed. In May of 1980, the district court ordered DoJ to submit "specific requirements which it considered necessary and feasible elements of a desegregation plan." After these requirements were submitted, the district court ordered both sides to begin negotiations in an attempt to reach an out-of-court settlement. After intense negotiations, a settlement (the consent decree) was reached on September 8, 1981 and approved by the court. The consent decree sought to improve racial diversity at institutions through recruitment strategies and by the enhancement of programs and facilities at predominately Black institutions. The consent decree did not determine whether the state was in violation of law and the right to contest liability was reserved.

The main ingredients of the consent decree were as follows:

- The implementation of 65 new academic programs at predominantly Black institutions (PBIs).
- A study to determine the extent of deficiencies in facilities on predominantly Black campuses, with funds set aside by the Board of Regents to address the deficiencies.
- The establishment of an enhancement fund for PBIs.
- An increase in the number of other-race students at Louisiana's public colleges and universities.
- Retention of open admissions for the duration of the consent decree.
- Other-race recruitment plans on each campus.
- Increased funding for developmental programs, with additional funding for PBIs.
- Scholarships for Black students in medicine, veterinary medicine, and dentistry.
- An employment application clearinghouse for Black faculty and professional staff.
- A graduate fellowship program to allow other-race students to complete the terminal degree.
- A faculty development program to allow faculty at PBIs to take sabbaticals to pursue the terminal degree.
- Cooperative programs between proximate institutions.
- The acquisition of an off-campus site for Southern University-Shreveport-Bossier City (SUSBO).

Louisiana did not completely fulfill all the requirements of the consent decree. Of the 65 new academic programs for predominately Black institutions, 63 were implemented. The facilities study of PBIs completed in 1982 revealed that much work needed to be done and the Board of Regents had by 1988 appropriated approximately $52,000,000 for construction of new facilities and upgrades to existing facilities. Louisiana experienced a fiscal crisis in the mid-1980s and a number of projects had to be delayed. An estimated $72,000,000 in additional funds were needed to complete the state's obligation. The state provided an enhancement fund for PBIs of approximately $6,000,000 for non-recurring expenses.

The consent decree set goals for the recruitment and enrollment of other-race students at Louisiana's colleges and universities, but they were largely unsuccessful in meeting these goals. Due to enhancements at predominately Black institutions for example, more Black students attended these institutions. The state theorized that it was not possible to enhance a campus to attract students of one race without making the campus more attractive to all races simultaneously. The state maintained open admissions to all colleges and universities during the term of the consent decree. The state also provided approximately $8,000,000 for developmental education and $6,800,000 for scholarships in medicine, veterinary medicine, and dentistry.

The Black Faculty and Professional Staff Clearinghouse was marginally successful because of heavy recruitment from states that did not require potential applicants to register with a clearinghouse. The state appropriated approximately $1,500,000 for the graduate fellowship program. Upon graduation, recipients agreed to teach at an institution where they were the minority. Scholarships were awarded to 58 students.

The consent decree was scheduled to expire on December 31, 1987 but the court determined that, on motion of summary judgment on the issue of liability from the U.S. Department of Justice in August 1988, Louisiana still maintained a dual college system based on race. The court set a tentative trial date in February 1989 and ordered both sides to reenter negotiations. The two sides could not reach an agreement and the court appointed a special master to recommend a remedial plan. The plan called for a single higher education board to replace the four existing boards, institutions would be differentiated by admission standards, and a merger of the LSU and Southern University law schools. All the defendants appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court; in 1990 the court dismissed the appeal “for want of jurisdiction,” the three-judge panel was dissolved, and the case was remanded to the district court under the responsibility of a single judge.

In September 1990, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals ruled in favor of the state of Mississippi in its desegregation case Ayers v. Allain and, relying on the Mississippi ruling, granted summary judgment to Louisiana. In Ayers, the legal grounds upon which Louisiana had been found liable in 1988 were rejected as being unsound. The U.S. Department of Justice and Southern University immediately appealed this decision. The Supreme Court agreed to review the Ayers decision in April 1991, vacated the judgment therein, and in June 1992 remanded the case back to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals for further consideration. In August 1992, DoJ requested that the Louisiana case be remanded back to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals as well.

In late 1994, Governor Edwin Edwards brokered a settlement agreement with the U.S. Department of Justice that was accepted by the U.S. District Court of the Eastern District of Louisiana. Under the agreement, the state was required to devote funds to develop the facilities and programs of its historically Black institutions so that they could attract more white students, actively recruit other-race applicants to state institutions, discontinue the development of identical programs, and instead develop distinct, high-demand degree programs to attract diverse student populations at institutions throughout the state, establish more community colleges, and finally to discontinue its statewide open admissions policy and institute selective admission standards at all four-year degree granting institutions, while reserving 15% of each entering class for admission “exceptions” in order to diversify each institution by allowing some less qualified students to enter.

In exchange for these terms, which had also been included in the 1993 ruling by the District Court before the Fifth Circuit Court appeal, the state avoided some of the more unpalatable remedies that had been named in previous rulings, and was instead allowed to:

1. Keep its multi-board system. The four-board system was a key part of the original segregated system in Louisiana, in which whites were educated by the flagship LSU System as well as by all but one of the regional universities in the University of Louisiana (formerly State Colleges and Universities) system, and, according to the pre-1974 state constitution, Grambling State University and the five-institution Southern University System were reserved specifically for African-American students. While the 1974 constitution eliminated any reference to race with regard to the governance or admissions policies of these systems and their institutions, they continued to be targeted by United States v. Louisiana since the systems, founded in the late 1800s and further segregated in reaction to Brown, created de facto segregation as a direct result of earlier de jure segregation. At first, Louisiana had not disputed the fact that the higher education system continued to perpetuate the segregation which the state's laws once mandated, then, beginning in 1992, maintained that it could comply with Title VI and the Equal Protection Clause without dismantling the multi-board system; the Agreement mandated more fiscal parity among the systems in order to help achieve this goal. In its 1993 remand, the Fifth Circuit Court had left the door open for a possible court-mandated merger, pending the District Court's reexamining the four-board system; the Settlement Agreement allowed Louisiana to avoid this entirely.

2. Keep all its campuses open, without closures or mergers. The original United States v. Louisiana suit charged that separate university campuses with nearly identical programs in four geographically proximate areas of the state—Southern and LSU in Baton Rouge, Louisiana Tech and Grambling in the Ruston area, Southern and LSU campuses in Shreveport, and University of New Orleans (UNO) and Southern University at New Orleans (SUNO)—were illegally segregated. Had final damages in the case been awarded, it was still possible that LSU's and Southern's law schools in Baton Rouge, as well as UNO and SUNO, might have been forced to merge; as noted above, although the 5th Circuit Court had reversed the District Court's judgment and remanded the case for trial, this was due to an "improperly granted" summary judgment based upon still disputed facts, not merely an inappropriate ruling of damages.

The Settlement Agreement, which required geographically proximate schools to cooperatively develop different degree programs in lieu of closures or mergers, was a major victory for proponents of both the historically white and historically Black institutions.

The Louisiana Board of Regents was created by the 1974 Louisiana Constitution to plan, coordinate, and have budgetary responsibility over all public higher education in the state. It succeeded the Coordinating Council for Higher Education. Members of the Board of Regents are appointed by the governor to six-year terms with at least one but no more than two Regents from each of Louisiana's congressional districts. In addition, the Legislature may appoint one student member.
